received the majority necessary for choice on the second ballot, his closest opponent being Hanford McNider, of Iowa; and the election of Massachusetts as the first American Legion through its delegates upon motion of McNider, seconded by Herbert, the election of Galbraith then was declared unanimous.

Passing of a resolution which puts the American Legion on record as being in favor of the following:

That while a majority report and a minority report should be presented, the report of the majority, which carried the vote, should be recommended that the American Legion through its delegates have the right under its charter and constitution to ascertain for the information of its members the attitude of candidates for public office towards such policies as

The Japanese question created the stormiest debate of the session it being necessary for the sergeant-at-arms and his assistants to quell the delegates several times.

On recommendation of the Americanization committee the convention voted
